Well, nobody will blame him "if" he can make the grade, "but" from casual observation there appear to be about as many "ifs" in the track of Mr. Lowden's candidacy as there are in Mr. Kipling's famous poem. A revised edition of which is annexed with the customary apology to the reader.

The Fullness of Times

By Willard Dore

SOME OF MR. LOWDEN'S "IFS."
If you can keep your head when all about you Others are losing theirs and blaming it on you, If you can stand the thrusts of Wit and satire aimed against you That will be aimed against your Fulman wealth
And stand perhaps for being called a flat tire
And manage to maintain your not-mal health,
If you can keep them shouting You're a wonder And make the farmers think that you're on top, Preserve yourself from any serious blunder
And stop the farmer marketing his crop;
If you can keep the times hard till convention,
And show that you are right in your contention
And keep the agriculturists feeling blue,
If you can kill the other strong contenders
Like Hoover, Longworth, Borah, Less et al,
And buckle up your blue denim suspender
I win the east away from silent Cal,
You can open up enough headquarters
To stump the doubtful states you very self,
And keep yourself unspotted by extorters
And not distribute any too much bells,
You can throttle Thompson's ligambition
And get the votes of glorious Ill-nois,
If maybe then you'll be in a position
To get to be vice president—my boy.
